SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY EDITORIAL POLICY

Social Psychology publishes articles concerning the processes and products of social interaction. This includes the study of the primary relations of individuals to one another, or to groups, collectivities, or institutions, and also the study of intra-individual processes insofar as they substantially influence, or are influenced by social forces.

The editors seek manuscripts which give theoretical structure to social psychology or report significant research that is clearly focused, well designed, and competently conducted and presented. The journal is intended to reflect both the theoretical and methodological diversity of social psychology. Its emphasis is on quality, whatever the data and the mode of analysis. Editors are receptive to original ideas on the growing edge of science. Contributions are invited from any sector of the scientific community oriented to the objectives of this journal.
